5 MOST SURPRISING STOCKS OF 2015 (SO FAR)

Anders Bylund | The Motley Fool

The famed S&P 500 index is up a meager 2.3% since New Year's Day, and the Dow Jones Industrials index has lost 0.4%.

We asked a panel of The Motley Fool contributors to outline the five biggest surprises they've seen in 2015, and this is what they came up with.

These stocks have gained between 54% and 152% this year — and that includes retreats from much loftier yearly highs in some cases.

Dig into these juicy stock stories right here:

NETFLIX

Brian Stoffel

Let's consider where Netflix stood when it entered 2015. Although the company's stock had fallen 25% in the last three months of 2014, it still traded for a hefty valuation.

Shares were valued at 90 times trailing earnings, and Netflix hadn't produced positive free cash flow during the year. The company had just announced ambitious plans to expand to nearly every country on the map and warned that it would take a while before its investments truly paid off.

Since then, the stock has more than doubled — up an amazing 125% in just seven months' time. Although it's still a mighty expensive holding — now over 300 times trailing earnings — the company's success at growing its subscriber base truly stands out.

ISLE OF CAPRI CASINOS

Rich Duprey

For a casino operator that once seemed to be on its deathbed as the island gambling oasis of Macau off mainland China attracted betting and investment dollars, Isle of Capri Casinos has to be one of the most surprising turnaround stories — not only of this year but of the past few years.

The casino operator's recovery began last year and accelerated in earnest in 2015, with shares more than doubling since the start of the year.

Isle of Capri Casinos owns or operates 15 casinos in seven states, and strong performance has fueled its drive higher, with revenue and earnings topping analyst expectations. A continuously improving economy and more disposable cash in consumers' pockets have been big factors in helping the casino operator outpace even its thriving industry.

Unlike other bigger, more well-known players, Isle of Capri Casinos doesn't have exposure to Macau. Thus, when revenue there started to plummet last year after a crackdown on corruption, the U.S.-based operator, whose properties are mostly in secondary markets, was unfazed. This has helped its stock perform far better than its gaming peers.

ELECTRONIC ARTS

Don Caplinger

It wasn't so long ago that many had declared the era of traditional video games dead, with the potential competition from mobile devices and other newer options threatening the viability of console-based video gaming. Yet Electronic Arts has defied calls for its early demise, with the stock vaulting higher by 57% so far in 2015 after roughly doubling in 2014.

Electronic Arts' renaissance was largely due to new hardware from the major game-console makers, which gave EA a chance to showcase its game-making capabilities. With core franchises including Battlefield, Dragon Age and sports must-haves like the Madden series of football video games, Electronic Arts has attracted gamers of all ages.

At the same time, EA has addressed some of the quality concerns that its customers had, with new games like Titanfall getting critical acclaim. EA's subscription service has also had early success. It offers gamers a chance to try older titles that they otherwise wouldn't buy, but at a price they're willing to pay, generating recurring revenue for the company.

NATURAL HEALTH TRENDS

Anders Bylund

Did you know that Natural Health Trends shares have soared 150% higher so far in 2015? That the stock is up a massive 250% over the last year?

More to the point — did you know that Natural Health Trends existed before seeing this article?

Natural Health Trends is a multilevel marketing firm, relying on a network of customers/contractors to sell the company's products. You could think of the company as the Tupperware of beauty products and nutritional supplements. If you've run across brands such as Valura, Skindulence, Premium Noni Juice or ReStor Vital, you've seen Natural Health Trends in action. You just didn't necessarily know it at the time.

So why is this no-name business storming up the charts in 2015?

Natural Health Trends is enjoying a golden age in international markets. Specifically, sales in Hong Kong accounted for 92% of the company's revenue in the recently reported first quarter, on the back of an 80% year-over-year sales increase. Hong Kong is the company's gateway into China — a local shipping center for customers and marketing partners in the Chinese mainland.

SKECHERS

Tamora Walsh

In the past, when you wanted to buy a pair of knockoff sneakers, Skechers was your one-stop shop. Today, however, the retailer has evolved from a cheap purveyor of off-brand footwear into the No. 2 brand share position in the U.S. athletic footwear market. As if that isn't surprising enough, the stock has gained an eye-popping 124% so far in 2015. Shares are now trading at an all-time high around $124 per share.

Skechers shocked Wall Street after delivering blowout first-quarter results in which sales climbed a record 40% to $76 million.

Earnings for the period also topped expectations, coming in at $1.10 per share. The strong fiscal 2015 first-quarter result came on the heels of an annual sales record of $2.4 billion in 2014.

It seems Skechers has a winning formula. The company isn't shy about using celebrity endorsements to move its products, including deals with drummer Ringo Starr, recording artist Demi Lovato and legendary quarterback Joe Montana and Joe Namath, to name a few. With the stock now trading near an all-time high, investors may want to remain on the sidelines for now.
